

July 17, 2017

Dear Sir/Madam,

I am taking the time to write this comment in support of protecting net neutrality. The internet is the tool most often used for research and sharing information. It has changed expectations in all fields and in education for how fast projects can be completed and communications exchanged.

In an economy, educational system, and global community that depends nearly entirely on internet accessibility, it is deplorable that this resource is being considered to be more accessible to corporations and the few individuals with the most money. Education and a universal tool should not be monetized, especially when it is not necessary.

In an era where the spotlight is on the redistribution of wealth benefitting corporations and the top .1% of earners in this country, the elimination of net neutrality would be nothing more than a nail in the coffin for middle and working class people. There is no reason that our access should be less than those making more money. It puts people at an unfair and extreme disadvantage wherever communication, business, and entrepreneurial endeavors are concerned.

Please serve the people of this country, we should be your biggest concern.

Sincerely,
Allison Miller
Santa Monica, CA

(leaving out additional personal information due to the recent leak of personal contact information by the White House)